It’s even more obvious when they do the work we’ve been raised to think of as inaccessible to humans, like those instances when a flightless bird flies.” (Visited 1,633 times, 1 visits today) “Wild animals don’t care if we use our words to define their behavior. Q: Explain to me how the tcp ip structure works? I am trying to understand how the "IP" protocol works. When tcp is sending a message to a host, the first thing that happens is that the "IP" header is extracted from the packet. Is it transported from the sending host to the receiving host using UDP or TCP? Why can't the entire message be transported using UDP?(UDP is a packet based protocol while TCP is a connection based protocol) What stops the entire message being transported using UDP? A: When TCP is sending a message to a host, the first thing that happens is that the "IP" header is extracted from the packet. Is it transported from the sending host to the receiving host using UDP or TCP? Not really. Why can't the entire message be transported using UDP? Because a UDP packet might be fragmented (fragment recovery is not guaranteed, even if you ask for it in the header). What stops the entire message being transported using UDP? There are two phases of a TCP connection. The connection start. The client and the server agree to establish a connection. This is a 3-way handshake and it uses TCP for the transport layer. The client and the server agree to use port numbers and they negotiate a port. There is no guarantee that the client and the server use the same port number. The connection is established. After this phase, it does not matter what protocol is used for the transport. Since a TCP connection is initiated with the protocol TCP and by design it is reliable, an error (or packet drop) in this phase is not acceptable. In the above phase, it does not matter if the data is UDP or TCP.
