The pharmacokinetics of theophylline has been investigated in six healthy volunteers who received a single dose of theophylline 25 mg as an intravenous infusion over 20 min and pharmacokinetic parameters were estimated by analysis of variance (ANOVA). As previously found by others, with theophylline plasma clearance and volume of distribution tended to be normally distributed, but volume of distribution increased with increasing body weight and clearance decreased. The inter- and intra-subject variability in volume of distribution and clearance was relatively large. The changes in theophylline pharmacokinetics after a single dose of theophylline were normally distributed. The point estimates of the between-subject variability (12.9%) and the within-subject variability (29.4%) in steady state
