Description of the Related Art Storage in a computer system is typically provided by one or more storage devices, such as disk drives (sometimes referred to as hard disk drives) that store digital information, magnetic storage media, optical storage media, or the like. A storage controller system (sometimes referred to as a storage controller) may be used to control access to the storage devices. The storage controller may provide interface logic that connects to one or more hosts or client computers that store and retrieve data on the storage devices. The storage controller system may utilize various storage protocols to provide various different services. Examples of commonly used storage protocols include Small Computer System Interface (SCSI), Fiber Channel Protocol (FCP), and the like. A host computer may issue storage commands to a storage device, which the storage device may return as status. The host computer may store the status in a storage reply buffer or data structure. The storage reply buffer may be located in memory or other storage connected to the host computer. The storage reply buffer may be time-stamped indicating when the storage command was received and when the status was returned to the host computer. The storage reply buffer may contain a plurality of status entries or records, each of which represents a single status return to a single storage command. After returning a status to the host, the storage controller may provide the status in a response to a storage command according to the service requested by the storage command. The response may be identified by an identified request identifier (ID), which is associated with the storage command and the service provided by the storage controller. The response may be a status message, such as a status message of no error found. The response may also be a failure
