nikon d5200.Q:
Mapping between
Push/Pull forces
and vectro/inertial forces At a certain point, I had difficulty in understanding the difference between the force applied by a system as opposed to the force applied by a body. We consider an elevator with a body with a mass m . The force applied by the elevator is \mathbf{F} .

Whereas if the body is pushed, the force applied is $\mathbf{F}_{\text{push}} = \mathbf{F}$, but if the body is pulled, the force applied is $\mathbf{F}_{\text{pull}} = \mathbf{\tilde{F}}$. Therefore, since both push and pull are being applied to the system, we get

two net forces
acting on the system as $\mathbf{F}_e = \mathbf{F} + \mathbf{F}_{\text{push}}$.

However, here, I
find difficulty in understanding the
difference
between pushing
and pulling forces.

Is it just a
misnomer to think of \mathbf{F}_{push} as

"pulling" force? A:
In the context of
the elevator
system, push is not exactly the same as pull. If you take a
cylindrical
elevator with a
support at the ground-floor, and
a weightless mass
at the top of the
elevator shaft,
then push on the
elevator will cause it to rise up, and pull on the elevator e79caf774b
