What's new:

human beings A Marine takes aim on the box office hit flick “Black Hawk Down.” It’s a good reason to see battle scenes from the movie. May 2, 2000 The way I see it, if I can’t get him to play “I Left My Heart in San Francisco,” then I’ve got to get him to play military. I must admit I take offense when writers, critics and moviegoers discuss the artistic merits of the Iraq War film “Black Hawk Down.” The fact is, it’s arguably the best war film ever made, one of the best war films ever made, one of the best foreign films ever made, and I can find others that rival its achievements when it comes to war films. It’s overwhelmingly entertaining, with a cast of real movie stars showing a surprising amount of subtle range to pull off the courage and counter-intuitive tactics of fighting on an ancient Afghan mountain for a poorly supplied American force against what most of the world presumes to be hopeless odds. Even The New Yorker, which I consider slightly above a magazine that causes nausea, ran a profile of the movie, a profile that specifically castigated me for accepting the title “consultant” for the Marine Corps that “Black Hawk Down” depicts—and my chief fault was that I was supposedly giving advice, rather than, as I was doing, being a sketchy eyes-only observer in the Afghan mountains above the strategic Ploosh valley. The writer seemed to focus in a particularly irritating way on the fact that the Marine I was profiling was 19 years old, which to my mind was both irrelevant and demeaning, despite the fact that his critics, even some of the optimists who write and see “Black Hawk Down,” may claim that it can just as well be made about a 40-year-old. The movie also has two young Native Americans in key roles, who I suspect were cast to boost the film’s potential appeal. In their mind-numbing monthly anti-war magazine (call ‘em “Chainmail” and you won’t have to worry about those pesky “dial tones” and you’ll make people think that you’re a “mature contemporary”), the movie critics mostly left me off the pedestal to make some general points
