The basic goal of this project is to determine if anticonvulsant drugs will have a neuroprotective or possibly antidromic effect in the spinal cord of rodents given spinal ischemia. The relationship of the electromyographic (EMG) parameters of ischemia to the potentiation of spinal cord seizures by anticonvulsant drugs will also be investigated. The neuroprotective activity of sodium valproate and the calcium antagonist verapamil, individually and in combination, will be evaluated in the rat spinal cord ischemia model. Calcium antagonists inhibit calmodulin dependent activities in many brain cells, and reduce the magnitude and frequency of cortical seizures produced by ischemia. On the basis of preliminary experiments and preliminary results with other anticonvulsant drugs, it is hypothesized that the anticonvulsant action of the calcium antagonist verapamil can be attributed to the reduction of calcium influx and the subsequent inhibition of brain cells from which the seizures are generated. The combination of calcium antagonists and sodium valproate, which enhances the anticonvulsant effect of either alone, is expected to have a synergistic effect with regard to the induction and prevention of ischemic seizures. The specificity of the action of these drugs will be tested using the cortical spreading depression (CSD) model of epilepsy. The research will continue to include the control of breathing in both sleeping and non-sleeping animals by putting a tracheal cannula tube inside the animal's windpipe. This will allow accurate control of inspiratory volume without stimulation of the brainstem. Initial experiments will establish the optimal method of placing the cannula.
